The Internet has changed the way billions of people live. The system's support of the Web, blogs, texting, games, video streaming and many other applications has revolutionized workplaces as well as how humans spend their leisure time. The Internet acts as the foundation for millions of user devices, such as computers and mobile phones. Yet most people have no idea about even the basic operations of this wondrous invention. This ignorance often handicaps their ability to exploit the power of the Internet. It also presents a dangerous situation: the loss of control of Internet usage, including the exposure of private data and the stealing of user information. The Internet is increasingly operating in more devices, such as kitchen appliances, automobiles, even heart monitors. The "Internet of Things" will soon be the "Internet of Everything." Whether the Internet's encroachment into your life is acceptable or disturbing is beside the point. The Internet is on its way into many facets of practically all humans' lives. The Internet of Things will lead to more convenience. But at what cost? Will we be able to block the Internet from our lives? Will the Internet remain active in our devices, even when we wish to have some solitude and privacy? Will we find ourselves at the mercy of hackers who use the Internet to gain access into financial transactions, door locks, even heart monitors? These seemingly unlikely operations are already part of Internet activities. Whether we mold the present Internet to be a beneficial or harmful model is up to us. This book lays the groundwork to enable you to take measures to control your use of the Internet, not for the Internet to control you. How we humans deal with the Internet now will determine how the Internet will deal with us in the future.
